To get there, Mr. Obama is proposing to offer tax credits and grants for solar power, call on utilities to increase the use of solar energy and create a federal loan program for solar power projects. But the proposal does not propose to cap how much of our energy is generated by fossil fuels or nuclear power. The plan calls for a 50 percent reduction in carbon emissions from power plants by 2030, but does not establish a cap on the amount of carbon that should be emitted. The administration does not say whether it will establish a carbon “fee” on fossil fuels. Obama’s plan is “the most ambitious policy proposal of the Obama administration to tackle climate change,” said League of Conservation Voters spokesman Gene Karpinski. “If enacted,” he added, “it would be a significant step toward a cleaner energy future.” A second, even more promising way to tackle climate change is to abandon our reliance on coal and instead focus on clean energy technologies that do not produce carbon pollution. It is semiconductor device fabrication and, more particularly, to a shielded etch for use in forming shallow trench isolation. Shallow trench isolation (STI) is a method that is being used to isolate the active areas of semiconductor devices. Typically, STI involves forming a trench between the active areas and filling the trench with an insulator, e.g., silicon dioxide. The STI isolation scheme is a desirable replacement for the local oxidation of silicon (LOCOS) because the STI scheme eliminates the problems associated with generating a bird's beak, eliminating the field oxide encroachment under the gate, and also allowing greater device packing density.

Although STI has been used for many years in the formation of semiconductor devices, conventional STI has been found to be deficient in various respects. For example, conventional STI requires etching of a large surface area of semiconductor substrate and then polishing the etching surface. The large etching surface area may be difficult and costly to etch and the polishing may lead to various topography issues, including non-uniformity in the polishing, poor film adhesion, and the like. As a result, conventional STI presents various challenges in implementing improved STI schemes and integrated circuits having enhanced yield and throughput. The present invention is directed to a semiconductor device comprising a semiconductor substrate having a surface, an active region formed in the surface of the semiconductor substrate, and a shallow trench isolation structure. The shallow trench isolation structure comprises a first insulator region within a first trench and a second insulator region within a second trench. In another aspect, the present invention is directed to a semiconductor device comprising a semiconductor substrate having a surface, an active region formed in the surface of the semiconductor substrate, and a shallow trench isolation structure. The shallow trench isolation structure comprises a first insulator region within a first trench and a second insulator region within a second trench. The first insulator region includes a first insulator material having a first dopant level and the second insulator region includes a second insulator
