Thank you! A: A generic password cracker is not very effective, they will work on a very small percentage of websites, most won't have a password field, and most won't have a checkbox for two factor authentication. Most likely this is a random password from their customer portal, which makes it all the more likely that it's not even a valid password. You can try asking support for more information about the attack - a change in their login policy, or a breach of their customer portal, etc, it may provide some useful information. A: If you are calling the vendor to confirm information, ask them this question: How many passwords were stolen? If they respond by saying "just one", that's good information - if they respond by saying "hundreds of thousands", that's even better. If they say "well we had no choice, we had to reset everyone's password", that's even better. Ask them if they're sending the passwords out via any other medium than the website. This could include emails, or letters or phone calls that attackers have received in the past. If the answers are "yes", ask them why that happened. (As suggested by Interplay and srdev) Ask them if the attackers need any specific information to crack the passwords. If the answers is "yes", then you'll probably have to ask them where the information is stored, and what it is. Keep in mind that if they say "anyone with access to this website can get the data", that is NOT a guarantee that an attacker needs access to the website. If the answers is "no", then you'll need to ask them what your options are. You'll have to judge how likely an attacker is to succeed in stealing the information, and how easy/cost-effective it is for you to defend your systems. Do NOT assume that someone else can defend your systems better than you can. Chris Wallace also said "rigged" and "crooked" repeatedly The Fox News host Chris Wallace once again called President Trump a "liar" during Wednesday night's hearing on the president's statements regarding intelligence on Russian election interference. The hearing focused on whether Trump's comments that he was wiretapped by former President Barack Obama when he was a candidate for president and his claims that the "Russia 6d1f23a050
